

“Interest – the force behind the scene”

Have you already played a game in which you lay behind only after a couple of moves? And from that point on you couldn’t get rid of the feeling that the rules of this game will prevent you to catch up?

In real life the decision of “who’s the winner” or “who’s the loser” is also made at the outset, although democracy and modern education systems stand for justice. But in the era in which economy decides more and more on our life, the chances are still not equal. So, what are the actual reasons of this “bad game”?

What are, however, the factors that let wealth and poverty exponentially drift apart within a very short time period? Why does in societies with pretending “equal conditions for all” aristocracy seems to be introduced into the economic system through the backdoor? Is there a relevant catalyst for this? And why do we need economic growth just to keep our standard of living?

Prof. Dr. Margrit Kennedy: “There’s a virtually undiscovered phenomenon most people can hardly even imagine, which functions like a built-in destruction mechanism in our economic system – and that’s interest.”

What happens if this powerful mechanism is deleted?
